capturing content, not figuring out logistics.

Why This List Exists

The brands that get the most out of a shoot day almost always show up with the same five things handled in advance. It's not about being a professional - it's about not spending your (and your crew's) time solving avoidable problems once the lights are already up. Work through this list a few days before your shoot and you'll walk away with content that actually gets used, not just footage that gets buried on a drive.

1. A Locked Shot List — Not Just a Vibe

"Something fun and brand-y" isn't a brief. Come with a real list of the specific shots/moments you need (hero product shot, a talking-head clip, 3-4 B-roll setups, etc.) tied to where each one will actually be used - website hero, a specific ad, a reel. A vague mood board gets you beautiful footage that doesn't solve the problem it was shot for.

2. Wardrobe & Styling Decided in Advance

Solid colors read better on camera than busy patterns, and colors that clash with your brand palette are hard to fix in post. Pick outfits (and a backup) the week before, not the morning of - laundry and ironing logistics eat more shoot-day time than people expect.

3. The Location Confirmed and Walked Through

Know the space before crew and gear show up: available power outlets, natural light direction and timing, any permission needed to shoot there, and a backup plan if it's outdoors and weather turns. A location surprise is the single most common thing that eats into shoot time.

4. A Realistic Timeline, With Buffer

Every setup - lighting, wardrobe changes, moving locations - takes longer than it looks. Build in 15-20% buffer per segment rather than back-to-back blocks. A rushed last shot is usually the one that mattered most.

5. One Person Empowered to Make Calls on Set

When six people all have an opinion on set, decisions slow down and shoot time disappears. Designate one decision-maker beforehand (yours or ours) so small calls - is this take good, do we need one more angle - don't turn into a group debate while the crew waits.
